Comments in writing: I live near a beautiful park. For the second year we have to live with an ugly blight, installed at great cost. There is no signage, but it is pretty obvious that this mess is part of the current million-tree-fraud. If it is, how can you call a dead stick less than a foot tall "a tree"? Taking an established tree from a nursery, with its big root ball, and planting it on public land counts to most folks as "planting a tree". It has a great chance of growing large. I fertilized and watered such saplings for the city when I was a teen. They all lived. Hundreds of dead seedlings are not and never will be trees. Please respect taxpayers as you pursue any sort of vanity project in the future. Why do city reports always fail to mention failures and 'setbacks'?
